In a field overrun with outdated texts, "Digital Radio Production" offers a refreshing and much needed alternative. It is the only text on the market to illuminate the world of radio as it exists in the 21st century, and to explore where radio is headed tomorrow - including an introduction to high definition radio, the next major radio transmission format. Written by an author with over 20 years of industry experience, the text speaks clearly to young people about practical realities (such as pursuing a first job in radio and creating an audition CD), while giving them solid production knowledge as well as realistic impression of the industry they may be considering for a career.

About the Author Don W. Connelly is currently an assistant professor of communications at Western Carolina University. He received an MA in communications from Central Missouri State University and began his broadcasting and teaching career as a manager of a public radio station for five years before moving to commercial radio. His commercial career included serving as a program/operations director, major market and state-wide network air-talent, sales and general manager. Connelly spent 17 years of his career in the Orlando, Florida market and was the Director of Affiliate Relations for Clear Channel Networks Florida's Radio Network when he decided to return to teaching. Connelly has received numerous production awards for his work in commercial and public radio.
