Every photograph serves as a footnote for how Vladimir Nabokov constructed his narratives in terms of structure, characterization, narrative, and style. Although one might view Alfred Appel, Jr.'s contribution as unique to limited aspects of the discipline of Slavonic Studies, in fact his masterful work belongs equally to elucidation of poorly understood elements in the discipline of Film Studies by virtue of the strong bond between the printed page and the silver screen. Although it was written some decades ago, its message and scholarship remain resonant as a study that serves as an important interdisciplinary component in the canon of the relation and bond between literature and the cinema.
